of the phase-out period. India offered to reduce the schedule to seven years, which was accepted by the majority of the Members of the Committee but the meeting concluded without consensus. During formal bilateral consultations held under the dispute settlement mechanism, India reached a mutually satisfactory solution each with Australia, Canada the European Communities, New Zealand and Switzerland, as well as with Japan which was a third party to the disputes, on a time schedule of six years with three consecutive phases of 3 years, 2 years and one year, for the removal of import restrictions in a balanced manner within each phase. Settlement: has not been reached only with the United States and at its request at a dispute settlement panel has been constituted in the WTO to examine the US allegation that the continued maintenance of quantitative restrictions on imports by India is inconsistent with India's obligations under the WTO agreements. The dispute settlement panel proceeding are presently underway.
